Halliwell's Filmgoer's Companion entry:

"American child performer of the thirties. Later appeared in "LOST IN ALASKA" (52), "BLOODHOUNDS OF BROADWAY" (52) and the TV series "So This Is Hollywood" (54)."

They Had Faces Then – Super Stars, Stars and Starlets of the 1930's entry:

"The daughter of Joe Keno and Rosie Green, a vaudeville act, who named her for the star Mitzi Hajos, she was born in the Bronx, October 22 1920. She joined her parents' act in Pittsburgh three years later, and was eventually given top billing in the act. The first child actress to be signed to a multi-picture contract at Paramount, she made eleven films for them between 1930 and 1932. In 1937 she returned to the stage in a hit musical, Rodgers and Hart's "Babes in Arms", and introduced "The Lady is a Tramp". After her marriage to film director Joseph Pevney, and becoming the mother of four children, her appearances were few. She died May 24th 1969, of cancer, in Huntington Beach, California."

" "I got a secret!" chortled Mitzi Green in "HONEY", as a demonic youngster, forever snooping and selling. Young Miss Green – or Little Mitzi, as she was originally billed – was a Dutch-bobbed dumpling with a brattish manner. She was also adept at imitations – George Arliss, Maurice Chevalier and Helen Kane being among the staples of her repertoire.

She romped through pictures like "FORBIDDEN ADVENTURE" and "HATTIE", playing to the hilt her role of enfant terrible. She was more conventionally cast in "SKIPPY" or "SOOKY" and as Becky Thatcher in "TOM SAWYER" and "HUCKLEBERRY FINN", but she helped things along there, too. She was also "LITTLE ORPHAN ANNIE" – the picture was even worse than the comic strip, but Mitzi played it with as much glee as possible.

Then she began to grow up and, except for her impersonations in "TRANSATLANTIC MERRY-GO-ROUND" (her scenes were cut before general release), she was finished on the screen. But before the thirties were over, she came back strong as the former kid movie star in Broadway's "Babes at Arms". Too bad she didn't have a chance to repeat in the movie version."
